Where a passenger has been to or stopped in a country or territory that is not set out above they will have to self-isolate until 14 days have passed since they left that country or territory.

Passengers will still need to provide contact information on arrival, unless they belong to one or more of the categories that currently qualify for an exemption, which include diplomats, consular officials and international organisation staff.

Her Majesty's Government stresses that the health of the public remains the Government's priority and will keep the conditions in these and other countries and territories under review.

Her Majesty's Government would like to assure you that these Regulations are applied without prejudice to any immunity or inviolability that an individual might otherwise enjoy.

The Devolved Administrations will publish their own policy for travel into Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland in the coming days.

More detailed information will be made available at www.protocol.fco.gov.uk, where you will also find information on other aspects of the UK's Covid-19 related restrictions. In addition, diplomatic missions and international organisations should continue to refer to the UK Government's guidance. Her Majesty's Government will continue to take the best public health advice and review the list of countries and territories regularly, and hopes to be able to add others to the exemption list. Border measures could be re-imposed at short notice for any country or territory if the risk worsens.
